Inside Her Charming
& Laid-back Bungalow

The dining area doubles as a workstation with the help of built-in bookcases and hidden electrical outlets. A banquette squeezes in extra seating, and conceals storage space for table linens and holiday decorations.

Nice Fit

Flexible furnishings, clever storage, and space-expanding colours make an 850-square-foot home just right.

Bigger isn't always better, even for avid collectors of French linens, vintage canning jars, and stacks of beautiful books. "For us, a bigger house would simply be an opportunity to accumulate more stuff," homeowner Jean Stéphane Beauchamp says.

So when interior designer Jean Stéphane and his partner Gaëtan Larochelle bought a Victorian home in Montreal, Canada, they set out to make the most of its very modest size, starting with a smart paint palette. Off-white walls and warm grey wood floors open up the rooms, and create a sense of flow. Pale blue ceilings give the impression of a little bit more height.

Against that backdrop, they looked for the best way to stow and show the things they love. In the combined living and dining area, the answer was new wall-to-wall cabinets and a banquette flanked by bookcases. In the kitchen, an old china cabinet supplied the Pale grey walls and lots of creamy white woodwork give a small kitchen character without a cluttered feel. The insides of the cabinets, right, are painted apple green, a happy leftover from a previous kitchen incarnation. charm and the space they craved—along with a little inspiration. “The beaded-board wainscoting in the back of the cupboard was original, so we repeated that detail on the other built-ins,” Gaëtan says. Narrow shelves mounted above the kitchen windows display a collection of vintage Mason jars, which are used as lanterns and vases.

Life in a small space prompts the couple to weigh the practicality of everything they own, Jean Stéphane says. Upholstered pieces are on wheels so they move easily. A quilted bedspread doubles as a tablecloth. Piles of books sometimes stand in for end tables. Even a collection of antique serving spoons, displayed like art in shadow boxes, can be called into duty “in case of an emergency,” Gaëtan adds, laughing. “If extra guests show up, you can break the glass.”

Still, the couple has no plans to stop collecting. “People are always asking me, ‘Don’t you want to go more minimal in a small space?’” Jean Stéphane says. On the contrary, his answer is, “You need to be cozy. You need to feel good.”

Big Ideas with Paint

Designer Jean Stéphane Beauchamp offers a few simple colour tricks for making a small space look larger.

Painting the insides of cabinets a darker colour gives an illusion of depth. Books and collectibles also blend into a darker background, instead of looking busy.

Contrast neutral walls with creamy white woodwork to enhance a room's size. Stark white walls make a room feel "brighter, not bigger," Jean Stéphane says. You can use ICI Dulux 7721 White Whisper for the walls and Lewis Berger 7P 1569 Villa Florence for the trim.

Don't be afraid to paint over brick if it's distracting. Jean Stéphane created a seamless look—and bucked local tradition—by painting masonry walls to blend with the rest of the interior. "Everybody screamed that you can't do that," he says. "But when they saw it, they pretty much all ran home and painted theirs."

Touches of black—in picture frames and a lampshade, above—add crisp contrast to an otherwise neutral scheme. "If we had gone for a bolder pattern and colour, it would look busy and crowded," Jean Stéphane says. A 13-foot-long sewing cabinet salvaged from a nearby convent serves as the base for living room built-ins, left. An old apple picker's ladder offers access to the top shelves.

“Every inch is at a premium. A bedskirt allows you to hide a ton, including that extra table-leaf and roller-bins full of coats, shoes, and seasonal clothes.”

The couple added a marble top and new hardware to an old dresser to make the bathroom vanity, above. Mounting a bowl-style sink on top and notching the top middle drawer's interior to make room for plumbing, leaves the drawers below functional. Off-white paint lessens the impact of a brick wall in the master bedroom, right, and makes the space feel larger. Eliminating a tiny second bedroom created ample space for a walk-in closet, above right. ■
